

Topic

I believe that someone's job should give him everything he wants and needs. So I don't think that money is more important than personal satisfaction, neither the other way round.

Which is more important in a job?:

Money or personal satisfaction or both?

Give your reasons.

A person's job must definitely offer him the money he needs

Money is required for our personal needs, meaning that a

Job should give someone the money he needs to maintain his house, to eat and clothe himself and more generally to shop the stuff that are necessary for him

The more money someone earns from his job, the more things he will be able to buy

So money plays an important role in someone's life and outside work for his personal satisfaction

STRUCTURE

Someone should not work somewhere if he doesn't like it and do something that doesn't offer him pleasure

The topic sentence

So someone's personal satisfaction plays a very important role in his job and in his life too

The first point

That's because the place that he works and what he does for his job should be a matter of what he likes.

The second point and not just a way to get money to survive the daily needs.

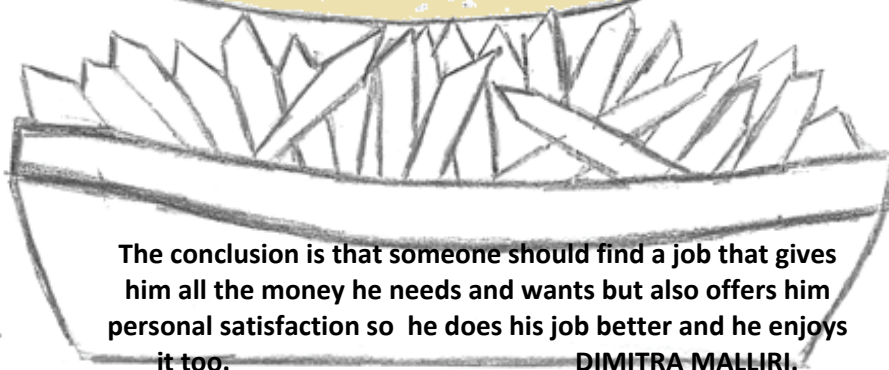

The third point

Jobs must also attract us in a way that we enjoy what we do.

The last point

So, we will be more willing to do our work and do it better than if we worked in a job we didn't like

The closing sentence

The conclusion is that someone should find a job that gives him all the money he needs and wants but also offers him personal satisfaction so he does his job better and he enjoys it too.
